CHEESE AND URIC ACID.

Bunge, the eminent Swiss physiological chemist, condemns cheese as a source of uric acid.

He says that the alkaline salts that should serve to eliminate the uric acid elements of the milk from which cheese is made are thrown out in the whey. If this conclusion is correct, cheese should not be eaten by persons subject to rheumatism or kidney diseases, especially, and the whole milk, converted to buttermilk, would be better in any case. (The use of potatoes would tend to correct the injurious effects of cheese and flesh meats and other uric acid producing foods, if they are indulged in. Dr. Haig, who has given the subject of uric acid patient study and elaborate investigation, recommends cheese as the best source of protein, and uses it himself. No doubt it is preferable to flesh, although if one use a quart of milk daily, with bread or cereals in other form, no other supply of protein will be necessary.)
